XML SiteMap Creator [Win/Mac] 2022 [New]

When I wrote the post about Getting Gmail's Top 50 To-Do List, I was surprised at how accurate my analysis of the list was. That's good because these fifty lists are tough to nail down. I mean, any list that includes such a huge range of tasks is going to be a mess, but I think I've nailed down at least a couple of the reasons why Gmail's to-do list is as varied as it is. Namely, the first is that no one is giving the geeks at Gmail a writing style guide. You see, while I'm pretty sure that they spend most of their time on the backend of their servers, they also need someone to make sure that they are consistently written in such a way that makes sense to their target audience. In this case, that target audience is people like me. And the second reason why the list is as varied as it is, is because Gmail's actually utilizing pretty much any task manager as an opportunity to try to sell you something. You see, my brain is constantly working on a range of really great things to do. And I've done my best to maintain a regular flow of projects. I've got a decent amount of books on my shelf that I'm always reading, and since I'm always looking for new ways to get paid and share information, I've added a fair amount of affiliate programs to my list of promotions to try out. However, the constant cycle of doing and doing and doing doesn't leave much room for new projects, so it's important that I manage to stay on top of my list of things to do. And that means staying on top of what the top 50 lists on the web are. That's why Gmail is putting out their list. So to find out what the first 50 things on my list were, I took a gander over the top 50 to-do lists and figured out what the others were accomplishing. I've got a couple more to look into, so keep checking back in. For now, here are the top 50 lists for 2009. The Beginning of January was a busy time for the world. First there was the new year, which meant new goals and new opportunities. And then
