I want to mount it as if it was local disk to the client (so the HTTP service doesn't fail on read access). Can I use fuse for that? A: You should use the tmpfs filesystem. It's small, extremely fast, and by default mounted on /run and populated with a lot of small RAM-sized files. If you want to add extra apps to this filesystem, you can use the tmpfs-mount option to set the "filesystem" mount point to the mount point of a directory on your filesystem. That way, you can mount a full system directory as the tmpfs filesystem, then place only the one or two files you need in that directory. Run this as root # mkdir -p /mnt/tmpfs # mount -t tmpfs -o ro,size=4096 /tmp/foo.img /mnt/tmpfs If you place an empty directory here, the filesystem will expand to fill it. This is a great place for keeping apps like rsync in. # mkdir -p /mnt/tmpfs/rsyncdir # mount -t tmpfs -o ro,size=4096 /tmp/foo.img /mnt/tmpfs/rsyncdir A: I believe this is similar to the "tmpfs mounting" in some ways (which is another FUSE filesystem for temporary files). From the Wikipedia article, these mount options apply: As part of the "fallocate()" function, the file system uses the allocation mode "falloc" and "fallocate()" to guarantee that the space is available even if the specified size isn't a multiple of the device blocksize. Allocating other than the maximum size does not result in a program-generated EINVAL error. In your case, this would mean that the CDN doesn't accept requests for those files, but
