Open multiple images Many new users of Photoshop begin with the most difficult task: opening an image. Existing files are most likely in a TIFF format, but they may also be in the Photoshop native file format (.psd). TIFF (Tagged Image File Format) is the industry standard file format for digital photography. For most types of digital imagery, Adobe recommends the TIFF format. If you're not familiar with TIFFs, then this section is for you. For more on editing JPEG images, see the later section "Creating layers and saving files." If you're proficient with TIFFs, skip to the next section. Users who prefer Photoshop files over Photoshop itself often use the Save for Web feature (a.k.a. Save for Web) to convert standard-resolution images into JPEG images suitable for Web access. Opening a file The first thing you want to do after you download the Photoshop files is to open them. It's essential that you work on standard-resolution images (300 dpi) to ensure that the results are ready to print or be scaled to meet the resolution requirements of your publication. Also, using the file-resolution option saves you memory space and helps you work faster by reducing the image size. Open Photoshop by double-clicking the Photoshop icon on your desktop. (Alternatively, you can find it under the Pictures icon on your computer's desktop.) A browser window opens with the Adobe Photoshop CS3 Free Download Welcome screen. You can use two images at once by clicking the Open Second Image button or selecting it from the Window menu. From the browser window, select Open File and navigate to the location where you've stored the Photoshop file you want to open. Then, double-click the file to open it in the Photoshop application window. From the Photoshop Welcome screen, your options are based on your exposure and resolution settings. You can change each setting using the eyedroppers (highlighted in yellow in Figure 15-1). Follow these steps: 1. To change the file resolution, click the eyedropper tool, as shown in Figure 15-1, and then drag in the image to set the resolution. 2. Click the eyedropper tool again and then click either the Normal or Tagged option. The file settings are highlighted with the Tagged option selected in the menu shown in Figure 15-1. 3. To change the file type, double-click the eyedro
