A Closer Look In this section, you'll explore all the applications and processes in Photoshop CS6. 1. Layer The lower-left panel in Photoshop CS6 includes a drop-down list of _layers_, as seen in Figure 6-2. Layers provide a way to organize the different elements that make up an image. You can also use the Layers panel to control the order in which the different layers are displayed and for printing and other manipulation tasks. Figure 6-2: The Layers panel enables you to easily organize layers for manipulation or printing. 2. Brush There are many ways you can manipulate the image in Photoshop, but the most common is to use the software's various brushes. A _brush_ is a tool that helps to add to the visual aspects of the image by modifying a part of it. From filling in colors to thinning out sections of the image to straightening out wrinkles in clothing, brushes are a very useful tool for adding dimension to your

Adobe Photoshop® and Photoshop® Elements® are registered trademarks of Adobe Systems Incorporated in the United States and/or other countries. Designers, photographers, retouching experts and others use Photoshop to edit, create, or both. This tutorial will show you how to create a professional look in Adobe Photoshop® with Photoshop Elements™. The tutorial will be divided into the following sections: A: Intro B: Using the stock items in Photoshop Elements C: Using the free downloadable textures, brushes and other stock items D: Using Photoshop to create your own brushes, textures and other assets E: Packing and organizing the content A: Intro During the tutorial you will learn how to create a new image, where to find the stock assets and how to import them. You will also see how to manipulate the elements and how to apply new textures, colour fills and other effects. At the end you will find a note on the PSE's file size and how to keep it down. B: Using the stock items in Photoshop Elements The stock assets provided by Adobe are free to download and use. However, you have to log in with your Adobe ID in order to download them. You can find the stock assets here: There are two versions of the stock assets. They are available in English, Spanish, French, German, Dutch, Hungarian, Romanian and Polish. All countries are supported by default. Stock assets can be used to save time and create the best possible images. You don't have to worry about the text or the graphic elements as they will be created for you. On the other hand, the stock assets do not offer a good variety. To open the stock assets, double-click on the asset or select Open. You will find a list of all the items available. As you scroll down, you will see the items in the following order: Design Templates (this is not an asset), 2D background, 3D background, Pattern, Texture, Gradient, Emotions, Color, Selection, Transform and Overlay. The Design Templates are the most commonly used assets. You can also use the Design Templates as an element, shape or pattern. You can also apply the background items to it. The 2D background is a quick and easy way to create a flat 05a79cecff

U.S. Pat. No. 6,562,645 to Reed describes a game display system comprising first and second game display units. The first game display unit can be used to display a game video while the second unit can be used to display a video of a game player as if the game player is viewing the game through a first-person view. U.S. Pat. No. 6,652,848 to Richardson et al. describes a game apparatus which provides a first image from a first virtual camera perspective and a second image from a second virtual camera perspective, and wherein the first and second images are of the same scene. The images are of different viewpoints, typically the first image is from a first location and a second location, with the second location being the perspective of the second virtual camera. Richardson et al. do not teach or suggest the multiple viewpoint display of the present invention. U.S. Patent Publication No. 2004/0050535 to Enfield describes a first image received by a helmet-mounted display and a second image received by a head-mounted display located in the first image. The head-mounted display can provide some control of the second image relative to the first image. The user can use a control to move the head-mounted display to generate a third image of the same scene in which the head-mounted display is located and which includes further features. The head-mounted display can also be used to specify settings for the helmet-mounted display. However, the display system of Enfield does not provide a system whereby a first image can be displayed to a first user of a first display and a second image can be viewed by a second user of a second display. Additionally, the apparatus of Enfield does not provide for any integration of the respective output signals from the respective display devices. None of the prior art shows or suggests a game apparatus whereby a first display device may display a first image to a first player of a first game and simultaneously display a second image to a second player of a second game. Neither do the prior art patents of Roelofs and Roberts teach or suggest the view switching of the present invention. Neither do the prior art patents of Richardson, Maynor and Roelofs disclose the viewing zones and ability to lock on to computer controlled objects of the present invention. Additionally, neither do the prior art patents of Roelofs, Maynor, Roelofs and Enfield teach or suggest the ability to locate games in a merged environment

--- layout: index title: Multi-table SQL queries --- To query data from the database, you will generally make use of a `query` as shown below. The result of the query is then supplied to a `render` function so that the output can be displayed in an HTML page: ~~~ {% highlight ruby %} class DogsController < ActiveRecord::Base < ActiveRecord::Base object that has been retrieved from the database in order to serve as the data source for the page. This is displayed in the following screenshot: !dogs-example When you start using Rails, you will find that you want to be able to query data from multiple tables. For example, you might have a table of products and a table of their respective price-points. A `has_many :through` relationship would let you relate these two tables so that you can query their combined data, and then group the results by the price-point of the product. In order to query data from multiple tables, the new multi-table SQL syntax is used. For example, if you have two tables (`products` and `prices`), you would set up the associations as follows: ~~~ {% highlight ruby %} class Price
