If an organism is infectious, they will live longer when they are produced in the laboratory, according to a study published in eLife this week. (Image credit: Biological Illustration / Wikipedia) By defining a longevity "rule" and reducing the population of infectious organisms in the lab, a team of researchers has made it more likely that lab-grown organisms will not cause infections. The discovery has huge implications for life-saving research, including production of alternative organs and tissue, and advanced gene therapy research. And a critical point to note: the idea came about as the result of extensive research of another topic, not in labs. The idea of the "dying out" rule was inspired by a concept called the Allee Effect, which takes its name from a microscopic, hunt-and-shoot prey-predator model in which prey population grows at a fixed rate until its predators are eliminated, at which point there are not enough prey to go around, and population crashes. The Allee Effect was theorized and first described in the 1920s, but has never been tested. The concept has been hotly debated for more than 100 years, but an argument in 2016 produced a new study, in which it was found that increasing the population of the prey beyond a critical level increased the survivability of prey in isolation from predators. Essentially, the Allee Effect predicts that a large group of individuals in the middle of a population will be the most likely to survive, even if in isolation. The study suggested that increasing the population of the prey "prevented infection with infectious agents." Why? Because the larger a group of individuals in a population, the less likely it is for an infected individual to be in the middle of that population. "This probability effect is an example of an Allee effect where there is an increased opportunity for infection to spread through a decrease in group size, which could result in death of a large proportion of individuals in a population," the authors of the new study explained. The team set out to determine whether that rule could be applied to any other conditions. "We applied the well-known Allee effect to laboratory-based systems, and found that at higher population densities, laboratory-generated organisms were less likely to be infectious compared to those generated at lower densities," the authors wrote in their study. Specifically, for any given bacterial or fungal population, when a population is large, say 200-500 individuals

Sabinene synthase Sabinene synthase (, Geosmertzia brevipes (Hook.) Kuzm. & Smiley) is an enzyme with systematic name geraniol:2-oxoglutarate dioxygenase (synthase, sabinene forming). This enzyme catalyses the following chemical reaction geraniol + 2-oxoglutarate + O<sub>2</sub> (+)-sabinene + succinate + CO<sub>2</sub> The product geraniol is a precursor in biosynthesis of all terpenoids, the benzoquinones, and the resin gummy in tea trees. In the Shadow of Night In the Shadow of Night is a 2012 studio album by American singer-songwriter Joshua Radin. The album was released on October 16, 2012, and is Radin's second album. The album debuted at No. 3 on the Billboard 200, selling 38,000 copies in its first week. In the Shadow of Night has also been certified gold by the RIAA. As of December 2013, the album has sold 43,000 copies in the United States. Background According to the band's website, Radin had made a demo version of the song "Just One of Those Things" by the time he was 22 years old. "The song was stuck in my head and the lyrics were so detailed that it made me wonder if the melody existed somewhere and I was just imagining it," Radin said. "In this attempt, I decided to simply capture the melody that was in my head without all the wacky lyrics." As Radin was recording with the jazz ensemble Palmetto Chorale, he decided to change the title to "Just One of Those Things". Although he did not find a publisher for the song, he recorded it at Steve Albini's Electrical Audio studios. The song was picked up by RCA Records and put out as the first single from the album. The song was played on KCRW's Morning Becomes Eclectic, then picked up by Q104.3's "Best of the Week". Lyrical themes The album's lyrical themes are "the feeling of not knowing what you're going to do, but you're sure that something is going to happen"; "the desire to change things for the
