This invention relates generally to a system for the delivery of compressed air to an environment and more particularly to an automatic brake control system for a railroad vehicle which selectively provides compressed air for the application of a brake cylinder to effect a controlled application and release of a train brake cylinder. The primary concern of a railroad operator, in the protection of the life of passengers and the operation of equipment, is the safe and efficient application and release of the train brake cylinder. Such release is required to selectively release the brake cylinder to permit the vehicle to proceed under normal operating conditions; to effect quick stops upon impact of the vehicle with an obstacle, and to slow the vehicle upon approach to a station. The operation of a train brake is accomplished by a brake control system which controls the release of compressed air from a compressor which supplies air to the brake cylinder as well as other functions for the control of the train. The operation of a control valve for the train brake is an on-off operation depending upon the pressure in the train brake cylinder. Normally, a valve is mounted on each car for selecting the application or release of the brake cylinder. Such prior art valves are of the solenoid operated type and produce a short pressure rise. After the solenoid is energized, the rate of rise is rapid until maximum pressure is reached and then the rate of release falls off. Some prior art valves are also of the proportional type which produces a less rapid and a more gradual change in pressure at the application and release position.
