spatial data can be represented as a set of two-dimensional coordinates; a point is represented by a (x, y) pair and a line is represented by two points. the coordinates are usually identified in the order they appear (coordinate pairs are often denoted as (x1, y1), (x2, y2), (x3, y3)). a polygon is represented by a finite set of points. the right picture shows the pieces and how they relate to each other; the position and game state of the pieces at any given time is visible on the left picture. each cell is occupied by a piece and a value is associated with each piece; it is the value at the location of the piece (in the original gui). the pieces are moved according to the state of the board and the rules of the game. notice that if the piece moved is not in a playing space, it is moved to the first available empty space of its type, with some adjustments made as described above. it is quite common for a data warehouse to be configured so that the company only displays the first 30 records retrieved from the data warehouse. we could make a new guis that displays only the first 30 records with our sample link to entities code. however, you can imagine how many records that would be for the 10 million records. in order to show all the records, we need to page through the results. fortunately, link to entities is designed to be used with the asp.net paging and filtering capability. in this tutorial, we will see how you can use the paging and filtering capability of link to entities to achieve this. first, let us take a look at the data and what we want to retrieve from the database and display to the user. 5ec8ef588b
